BookSpot

The app allows registered users to swap books by posting the location and description of the book on the map. The app was created in two weeks by a two-member team as a class assignment. The main requirement for the assignment was to make a map-based application that would have map with annotations, allow to take pictures, and have a list of the books.

The idea behind BookSpot was trying to make traditional book swapping a more engaging and exciting activity with a slight sense of adventure to it. By using BookSpot people can leave books anywhere they feel like (even hide them) and post the location of the book with picture and description of how to find it. All app users can see the updated location on map and also in the list of the most recently added book. If someone finds the book, they can then press the button in the description that will show that the book is already taken. There were more features and user interaction planned in BookSpot, however, it went behind the scope of the current project.

Features of the final product:

- Facebook and Twitter registration
- Map with annotated pins and user location
- Add book with description, picture, and automated location
- Count of books added and found
- List of recently added books

On the next pages you will find some screenshots of the app.
